He has eyes like daggers. They are sharp and penetrating. They can wound and devastate. They can intimidate and decimate. And they did. They always used to leave me feeling one layer short.

Until I really looked. Deep inside, beyond the green flecks and red rings, his eyes are sad. They are lonely and yearning. They are trusting and curious.

When his eyes finally find what they are seeking, they are warm and gentle. They can love and adore. They can make me feel safe and secure.

His eyes can say everything that his lips cannot. They pierce my heart.
